Chase County declared natural disaster area

The U.S. Department of Agriculture has designated Chase and Keith counties in western Nebraska as natural disaster areas.

The designation comes in response to excessive rain, hail and high winds that struck the region in June.

Farmers and ranchers may also qualify for natural disaster assistance if they live in Arthur, Deuel, Dundy, Garden, Hayes, Lincoln, McPherson or Perkins counties.

A federal disaster designation allows farm operators to obtain low-interest emergency loans, if they meet eligibility requirements. Farmers have eight months from the declaration date to apply for a loan to cover part of their actual losses.

Commissioners remind landowners of mowing

Chase County's Board of Commissioners recently issued a reminder to land owners in the county of their responsibility to mow ditches bordering their property.

By statute, landowners are required to mow twice each year, according to a notice issued by the commissioners. All that is needed, read the notice, is one pass along the road side.

On Oct. 17 county employees will begin mowing ditches that have been neglected and land ranchers to adhere to import rules.

State Agriculture Director Greg Ibach said Wednesday officials have begun quarantining herds if ranchers haven't followed import rules. The Agriculture Department is concerned cattle from southern states could be infected with trichomoniasis, which can cause infertility and miscarriages in cattle.

Ranchers must be able to prove the cattle they import are disease-free. Ibach said any cattle producers who are thinking about importing animals should contact the state veterinarian's office to make sure they understand the restrictions.
